Time is considered to be an attribute of the conscious Ego. Its linear quality provides sustenance to our ability to experience past, present and future as distinct qualities in our lives. The timelessness of the unconscious remains a conundrum in the sense that either time is not substantiated at all in the unconscious or it possesses different qualities. Memory as an evolution, that is something that does not belong necessarily to the past, questions the linear aspect of conscious time. The unconscious waking thinking alongside the conscious thinking challenges our customary conception of different qualities in conscious and unconscious life. Both approaches open a path in our effort to grasp the concept of time in the unconscious.
